The Marvels of Arches National Park

Arches National Park is a fascinating testament to the forces of nature that have shaped our planet over millions of years. Located in southeastern Utah, the park spans over 76,000 acres and contains the world's largest concentration of natural stone arches. From delicate, delicate "frosted" arches like Landscape Arch to the famous Delicate Arch, this park offers a variety of unique formations that will leave you in awe.

The geological history of the park is a story that dates back to the Jurassic period, when massive sand dunes were deposited and compressed over time to form the famous red rock landscape. Over millions of years, erosion sculpted these rocks into the magnificent arches we see today.

Drive around a bit, and you can view about 20 arches without leaving the comfort of your car. The number doubles if you add in a few short hiking trails -- and the memories will last a lifetime.
