Tucked in the pine and birch woods of northern Wisconsin, Matt Harris has life-changing business to do. Representing the company promising a better future to his hometown and state, Matt returns to find that towns and people can change — drastically. Deprived of the once robust blue-collar economy, buildings have been boarded up, the school has declined, politics have grown bitter, and poverty reigns supreme. The growing plight of rural and Midwestern USA has hit home or, maybe, it was always there. Determined to please both his boss and the town, Matt must confront his greatest dilemma: whether he should use his ambition to help his hometown or to help himself. Through challenges of love, hate, ethics, and pride, Matt learns a lot about life on his visit home—but at what cost?

North of Highway 8 explores the plight of rural America, man's inherent connection with nature, and the importance of tolerance, friendship, and ethics. Author Jacob Gardner questions: How far will you go for your pride or your career? What does it really mean to love your home? What is the balance between people's prosperity and the Earth's welfare?

“A nostalgic novel filled with life's little lessons about home, the need to escape, and the shock of rediscovering what you left behind. Anyone with strong feelings about where they're from—either with love or hate—will feel like this book was written for them.” —Independent Book Review

“A novel of sharp insights and plenty of page-turning emotional drama... Mesmerizing. Undeniably enthralling. Read it.” - The Prairies Book Review
