In a future post-apocalyptic world, full of warring tribal city-states, a growing movement of fundamentalist religious dissidents threatens the regional peace provided by the imperial American city-state, Refugium. The foremost technocratic city-state on the continent, Refugium feels the first pains of attack in its heart, city-center park. A supernatural war is coming, they shout and scream and pray, putting the city's residents on edge. Many see them as victims, unfortunates susceptible to the narcissistic imaginations resulting from Mind Quadrature, a dreaded side effect of the consciousness projection technology the city is known for. But the side-effected are normally few and far-between while this movement seems to be spreading quickly like a virus.

After learning of a terminal diagnosis, Sam, an aging beaten-down former supervillain turned security guard and born-again Christian plans to finish out his life in peace and quiet. But a past love shows up at his door after forty years claiming to be a seer and spokesman for God and for the movement of religious zealots gathering in city-center park. Sam is asked to believe that their ravings are real and that his role is key. If only he will let the seer open his eyes, he could finally be a hero. The childhood dream lost to him when life forced him the other way into infamy. Unsure still if the villain he used to be lurks inside, he believes his chance to be a hero is long gone. He is old and the biotechnological chemicals that once gave him power are now killing him. The choices materialize before him, will he embrace a possibly false hope and open his mind to the seer? Enter a supernatural fray that he is not sure even exists and will surely hasten his radioactive decay if it does? Or will he stick to his simple routines, prolong the calm, and increase the number of his remaining days. Is the former love of his life truly a seer or suffering from a Mind-Quadrated imagination? The questions weigh heavy on Sam as the city's real future could hang on what he chooses to believe.
