In his mid-30s, Guy Hanley and his wife Anne made the decision to leave their hectic life in London for a new one in mainland south west Greece, taking their four cats with them. They were looking for a more relaxed life, better weather, to keep chickens and to try to become partly self-sufficient, growing all of their own fruit and vegetables.

They also wanted to learn the notoriously difficult language and explore the country and its traditions.

This book tells the story of their first decade in Greece, their successes and many failures, the ups and downs of life abroad, interwoven with handy hints on Mediterranean gardening, keeping chickens and Guy's recipes recreating the gorgeous classic Greek dishes served up in the village tavernas.

It will also explain how a household with originally just four animals ended up being one with 28.
